***Saturday*** June 22, 7:00 pm ORDINARY PEOPLE - REEL MADNESS style with discussion

Robert Redford directed this film that deservedly cleaned up at the Oscars in 1980. It stars Judd Hirsh, Timothy Hutton, Mary Tyler Moore and Donald Sutherland. It deals sensitively with a family's struggle to cope with the death of a son. Each family member tries to cope in his or her own way, largely in isolation from the others. Eventually, sessions with a psychiatrist (Hirsh) enable the father (Sutherland) and surviving son (Hutton) to reestablish a relationship.

This screening and discussion is in memory of David Martin and others who have taken their own lives. David, who was 39 and a Langford contractor died in April. His story has been widely publicized (which in itself is unusual) because his suicide was so unexpected and because he left a note alleging sexual abuse in his youth as a reason for his despair. It was also noticed that there was also a sad lack of counselling resources for his widow and others who survive.

Counsellor Sharon Kobrinsky of Pacific Centre Family Services (who is Sharon Martin's counsellor and has offered her services to facilitate a support group for people suffering loss through suicide) and Movie Monday's Bruce Saunders

(who has twice ventured over that edge) agree that suicide is something about which there needs to be more open, constructive discourse. They will be facilitating the after-screening discussion.

Too many people try to live through the suicide of a loved one without benefit of outside help because they can't afford it. The purpose of this event is to establish a fund that makes counselling available to them.
